Invesco Growth Multi-Asset Allocation ETF

Analyst Report

The Invesco Growth Multi-Asset Allocation ETF is an actively-managed fund of funds that aims to provide long-term capital appreciation. Depending on market conditions, the fund will invest 65 percent to 95 percent of its portfolio in equity ETFs, 5 percent to 35 percent in fixed income ETFs, and 10 percent to 15 percent in American and global depository receipts. PSMG achieves its asset mix by investing largely in a mix of other Invesco ETFs. It's important to note, investors are not double-charged for fund fees. Rather, PSMG charges an ultra-low management fee of its own that's comparable to some of the cheapest index offerings from bargain fund issuers. On top of that, PSMG investors pay acquired fund fees for PSMG's underlying holdings. The total cost, which is the number you see listed as the expense ratio on ETFdb's fund description page, represents the all-in management fee for investors. Though it's pricier than some of the cheapest index funds on the market, PSMG's costs are competitive compared with other actively-managed funds (and significantly lower a few high-cost providers of complicated index strategies.) For an all-in-one asset allocation strategy, the fees are quite reasonable. The fund is the most aggressive of the four asset allocation ETFs that Invesco launched in 2017. Asset allocation funds of funds are a staple in the mutual fund space because they offer a simple, single-ticker way to purchase an entire asset allocation, but they have been slow to catch on in ETFs. Many investors with a 401k own mutual funds that operate much the same way, such as single-ticket asset allocation funds or target-date retirement funds that are designed to meet investors' goals, time horizon and risk tolerance. For buy-and-hold investors that want a single-ticker solution combined with the tax efficiencies and low costs of ETFs, asset allocation strategies like PSMG are worth a look.
